

Understanding the 'old' and 'new' (version 5) pre-built tests in Qest4 and Asyra

When the Asyra was very first on the market in Europe in 2005, the only pre-built test in the system was the Comprehensive Analysis. At this time other tests were made up in training, and, to some extent, the reasons for adding each one was explored in the group discussion.

Fairly quickly, it became apparent that practitioners felt comfortable if there was a selection of tests made up in the software when it was installed. This saved having to make them up during or after training, and gave a sense of solidarity from having the system configured in a similar way to other practitioners.

The test list in Figure 1 will be familiar to most people who acquired a system between 2005 and 2019. It includes a number of physiologic and metabolic filters that are often from the CA, run as 1x1, items along with foods, environmentals and some mixed protocols. During training, at least from our UK office, this would be complemented by more protocols that had specific ideas behind them, such as Compensatory Drift, Advanced Allergy, Degenerative Disturbance, Matter-Energy Disruption, most of which were created by Mark Galloway during the 2005-10 era.

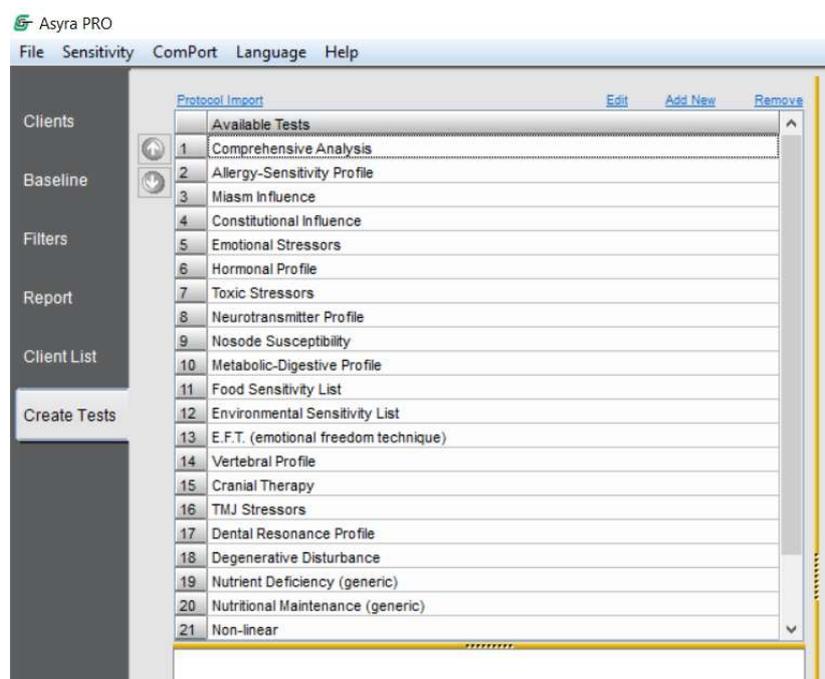

Figure 1: 2005-19 era list

There were always a few practitioners who would immediately create their own schema, but for the most part people treated the pre-built list as the core and added to it conservatively, most commonly adding remedy libraries.

The test list became 'part of the furniture' along with certain understandings about using (or not using) the various optional parameters available in the system: different combinations of imprint, use of the system to choose durations and quantities, and also certain ways of describing the meaning of those parameters.

For those looking at the 2020 system and how clean version 5 installs show up, and comparing, the first thing to be understood is that none of the conventions or received wisdoms of the earlier period are now deemed wrong or those ideas superseded. However, every now and again, a publisher must look to its current audience, re-assess what is offered as the default setup and what is included in the base instruction set. The changes made reflect a mixture of the emphasis of the manufacturer (Qest LLC), the opinions of the distribution and training teams worldwide, libraries that have been made available or become popular and the changing requirements and comfort-zones of system purchasers.

The new test set then, which is available to all practitioners as either a clean install, or to add to your existing database, looks fairly different. It is represented in Figure 2. On examination, quite a few of the individual tests from the earlier version are now incorporated in the Informational Scan. There are also a quite large quantity of anatomically-grouped tests: relating to each organ in the physical body. Within each of these are many factors relating to non-physical factors so that ground is covered by using them, but the hierarchy starts from the anatomy level.

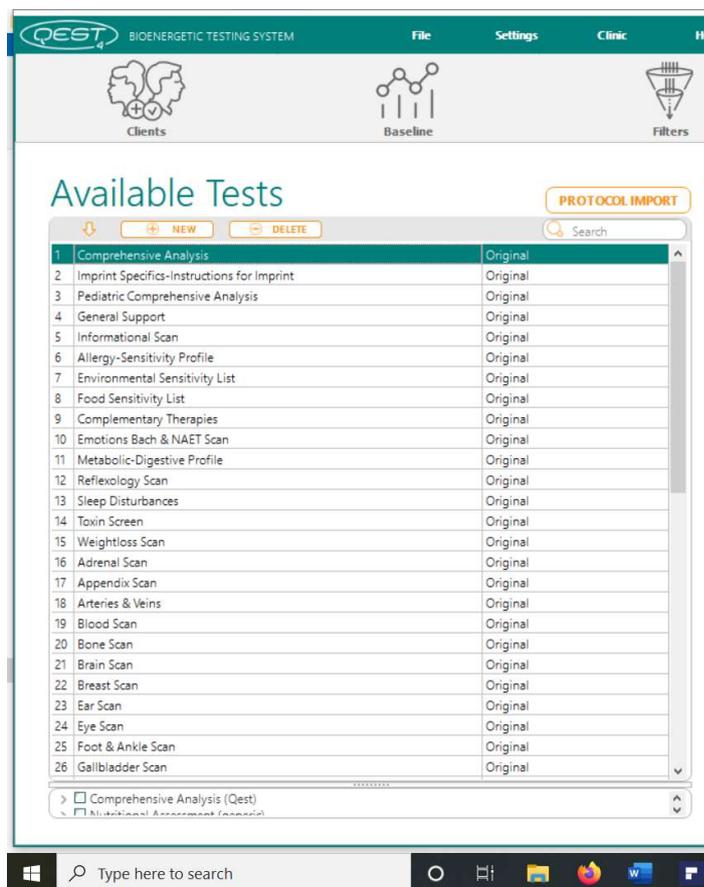

Fig2: version 5 2020 test list (partial)

Also among the new additions are scans that are aimed at specific groups: children, animals and others. This is a slight contrast to the previous test set that remained agnostic about its population sub-groups! The intention of the change was to bring information that is more likely to be perceived as relevant to the client. (Remember any energetic test has the bias of the test creator as a given, and this is not wrong, just a necessary choice.)

The 2020 test list has been given a lot of consideration over time by group of people. It reflects a mixture of needs. It is in many ways much more organised and complete than the previous one, which always immediately invited additions. As always, we remember that the Search facility is a partial or complete alternative to saving a new test. The Search process is dynamic but time-consuming. The test creation promotes stasis but also saves time. Trade-off.

Some people will inevitably find the contrast confusing, along with revised suggestions in the latest training about how to use or interpret the parameters. It begs questions for every practitioner who may be looking to refresh their system. Some trainers have found they prefer the new default setup to their well-loved previous version.

The questions that come up cannot be answered for you, though if you only ever see the 'old' or 'new' versions then effectively it may be until you see someone else's setup. If you generally like to make leaps, then feel free to move wholesale to the new setup. If you prefer gradual evolutions, then absorb what you like gradually.

Important things to recognise are that there is no 'right' list of tests, nor a right way to combine or emphasise the different parameters, or way to imprint remedies. As a publisher, Qest LLC needs to provide the system in a user-friendly format with lots of inbuilt things to make it easy to start working. You can take that and do as you want to with it.

Consider the comparison to mobile-smart phones which now come pre-loaded with a multitude of apps. At one time that wasn't the case. Even now, some people will uninstall most of them and choose their own. Other enthusiasts find that unless they have 'rooted' their phone to get access to the operating system, its just not flexible enough for their taste.

For many long-standing users of the new system, the logical thing may be to retain your existing test list, import the new set of tests, and then gradually refine the overall picture to reflect the best of both. For others, the opportunity to have a complete re-start may be attractive.

In all cases, you still have a system which, when used well, will bring a valuable additional set of insights to your consultation process, and allow the feedback of that information via exploration and via imprinting. Energetic testing is always a conversation with the body-mind system, and as in any kind of body-mind healing, there is no single way to do it – as your work just provokes a shift that continues to move under the control of a more subtle power.

In short then, use either set of tests, or combine them, or make your own 😊

(Keep an eye out on Qestessentials and qest4.eu for webinars and classes that help in the familiarisation process.)